To permit and ease use of such devices, the most common medical device packaging consists of a plastic, thin-walled, blister package that is open at one end to receive the device. The blister package is closed by heat sealing and has a fluid-tight lid on its open end. Typically, the blister package is opened with a separate lid that has a sharp point and a ridge or shoulder. Once the device is removed, the plastic package is torn open along the sharp point and ridge of the lid, and the device is removed. The blister package is typically packed with the device to provide secure handling. While blister packages are convenient and adequate for use with single unit medical devices, they are not well suited for multi-unit medical device packages. The blister package is difficult to open. Even when the device is easily removed from the blister package, a sharp point and ridge on the lid can cause damage to the device. Additionally, the blister package is not very convenient for measuring doses, and the package is not conveniently used to dose liquids. Thus, a need exists for a multi-unit medical device packaging device that is easy to open and dose liquids.Diastereoselective assembly of substituted cis-fused-2-sulfonyl-1,3-azaphospholanes: preparation of spiro-fused phospholanes and bicyclo-fused phospholanes.
