The ethno-political protests in Brazil are accompanied by an economic crisis and a significant decline in the country's agricultural production. But the country's food industry is beginning to look for new markets and faces fresh competition from Europe, where countries such as Greece, Spain and Italy are experiencing various types of food crises. In these hard times, Brazilian exports have lost some of their traditional markets in the United States and China. China's import and investment controls over Brazilian beef have also been subject to decline, due to the devaluation of the Chinese currency and the shortage of Brazilian beef. The uncertainties of the Brazilian economic situation have become more pronounced. Many companies have already suspended or postponed negotiations over new trade agreements with South American countries, such as Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay, Peru and Uruguay. Brazil has also seen a significant decline in tourism, due to corruption, violence and political infighting. In August, the Tourism Minister was kidnapped in Rio de Janeiro and his body was found the following week. In the meantime, the country's food industry is beginning to look for new markets and faces fresh competition from Europe, where countries such as Greece, Spain and Italy are experiencing various types of food crises. And the European Union is pushing Brazil to reform its agriculture sector. Over the years, since he became president, Lula has focused on agriculture and made the country a viable option for major food companies. In recent years, companies such as McDonald's, Burger King, Coca-Cola, Kraft and Nestlé have been investing heavily in the Brazilian market. This progress has attracted the attention of foreign investors who have purchased farms throughout Brazil and are seeking ways to increase their productivity. They have also invested in foreign lands that are more suitable for the cultivation of soybeans. Apart from these, more
