What's new in Lord Temin's Fortress:

: News, Views, and Policy Priorities for the Hill Thursday, September 14, 2006 The NSA and the Legal Paradox In Slate this week, William Saletan reports that the National Security Agency has gathered information on every e-mail that Americans have sent to or received from someone overseas since the beginning of this year. The analysis has been ongoing for the last few weeks, but was interrupted when the New York Times broke the story. There has been a lot of angry reaction, and in many ways it's interesting to reexamine the NSA's legal position with this unusual fact in mind, and it's also interesting to think about the implications of this new legal event for the Internet. The legal authority for the NSA's activities comes from Section 215 of the USA Patriot Act. The implementation of that provision, in Section 702 of the FISA Amendments Act, has some legal complications, and basically gives the government retroactive authority to spy on targets who have made communications with someone located overseas at some point between the crucial time and now. In another sense, the Patriot Act has been operationalized; one- and two-year emergency authorizations have been extended every few months by various courts, and now that this version of the law is in place, the government will never need another authorization, since it could be argued that what it's doing is in the interest of national security, and because information protected by the Fourth Amendment would not be used against Americans in any case. This legal paradox ought to provoke an interesting class of cases in the future. One possibility is that the government will be able to argue that they were in fact "collecting" when they were tracking communications (as opposed to recording in real time), since any records of such activity are available to them now. Another possibility is that NSA officials will argue that they have "mistakenly" maintained records relating to communication with an American, and ought to be given access to them now to correct that mistake. More plausibly, of course, the NSA will argue that it should not have to keep records at all-- that the Communications Amendments Act of 2007 already accounts for that, and that the records the organization has should be considered "consistent with" those laws. Every legal system is good at handling legal authority that is retroactive. But in the case of new legal activity, retroactivity is more problematic, since it is potentially open to any sort of abuse. The interesting question is to what extent this newly legal activity should be open to
