This review highlights the significance and use of microarray analysis in the diagnosis and prognosis of various cancer types. The traditional methods (e.g., histopathology, immunohistochemistry) remain key methods in the diagnosis of and assessment of prognosis of cancers. When samples are limited, microarray analysis can be used as an adjunct to the traditional methods. For patients with systemic cancers, if samples are available, microarray analysis can be used as a potential tool to investigate molecular signatures of cancers with potential prognostic and predictive value. Automated morphological measurements of blood cells are indispensable in modern clinical laboratories for monitoring and diagnosing various diseases, such as hematological diseases, infectious diseases, and inflammatory diseases. Most of these diseases are highly associated with abnormal circulating blood cell counts and cell morphology, such as shape, size, and form of red blood cells. For example, an analysis of blood smears is helpful in diagnosing leukemia, lymphoma, or disease involving blood cell morphology. Automated morphological measurement of blood cells in a blood sample (e.g., a whole blood sample or a blood cell fraction, such as a white blood cell or a platelet count) is typically accomplished by scanning the blood sample on a microscope slide and inputting images of the blood sample into an analysis software system that analyzes the images, classifies the blood cells, and determines the number of blood cells from the classified blood cells. Blood sample preparation commonly involves preparation of slides (i.e., collection of the blood cells on a slide), staining of the cells (i.e., appearance of the cells through dilution of the blood sample with a dye and/or processing the blood sample with the dye), and fixing the cells on the slide. The processing of the blood sample may include, for example, a lysis step for degrading cells by breaking the membrane of the cells, a fixation step for preventing the
